

Excerpt from Essays and Observations on the Following Subjects The Gentlemen, who by a voluntary Association formed themselves into a Society, pretty well known at present by the Name of the Dublin Society, having already given the Publick some general Account of the Design that first brought them together, and which they ever since have unweariedly pursued; it will be sufficient for the Purpose of this Paper, to inform the Reader of the particular Reasons which have now engaged them to give their Instructions a new Form, and to endeavour the farther Improvement of Husbandry, and other useful Arts, by weekly Observations. It may seem at first Sight, that Pamphlets and the larger Kinds of Essays are better fitted to convey Instructions of this Nature, than the loose Sheets which they intend to publish for the future: 'Tis a plausible Objection against the latter Method, that the Connexion being interrupted, and the Directions to the Husbandman and others confined and cramped by the Dimensions of the Paper, something must probably be lost of that Clearness and Exactness which are absolutely requisite to make such Writings useful: But when the Thing is more attentively considered, the Advantages will certainly be found to lye all the other Way; and that, far from being more obscure, the Societys Instructions by these Means will become more distinct and more implicit.
