

Excerpt from The Works of Charles Follen, Vol. 4 of 5: With a Memoir of His Life He who wishes to gratify an enlightened and refined audience by lectures on German literature, is subject to peculiar trials and temptations. They are not so much the trials of a poor man, striving, under the inspiration of distress, to make something out of nothing, - but are rather like those of the rich, willing to give, but troubled about the ways of giving; anxious lest by offering too much of one thing, or a little of every thing, he should surfeit or spoil the appetite of his friends, instead of promoting either the lasting advantage of many, or the high and healthful enjoyment of a few kindred minds. Literary Germany is indeed a region whose resources may satisfy the most extravagant expectation, by their immeasurable extent, whether you consider the intellectual patrimony, which, during the course of many centuries, has been transmitted, faithfully preserved and augmented from generation to generation, or the fruits of literary industry, which every year produces, and not unfrequently consumes.
